Finding the extreme points (the frame) of the convex hull of a finite point set is considered "easy" in computational geometry. It does, however, present many algorithmic and computational challenges when the point sets are large. This occurs in different applications such as in efficiency measurement and fraud detection. We present a new framework for the frame problem when data is streaming in and introduce an algorithm that exploits the rich geometry behind these problems.